

Negations in Fiction

In this paper, I would like to investigate in how far we can use stories to learn about logic. How can we engage with fiction in order to come to find out what logical principles are actually valid? Is that possible at all? I claim that it is, and I propose two case studies that focus on non-classical accounts of negations in stories, namely the constructive and the paraconsistent account.